TASTING THE MISERY OF GAZA

Christal Hayes Reporting from Los Angeles BBC Jan/09/2025

Much of the heart of Hollywood is blanketed in thick smoke. You can barely see the tops of the towering palm trees that line streets here.

It is utter chaos on the streets near the fire. People are using sweatshirts to cover their faces so they can breathe. Many are carrying bags and suitcases looking for a place to go. Some are wearing pyjamas, clearly taken by surprise.

The Sunset fire broke out at around 18:00 (02:00 GMT) local time on Wednesday, covering much of Hollywood in thick smoke and forcing an evacuation order. By midnight local time the fire covered an area of 60 acres.

While driving in Hollywood, I saw many people running away from their homes with whatever belongings they could carry.

As I pulled over, some of them responded to me in fear and anxiety.

"Are you here to help people? Where do I go?" Anna Waldman asked as I got out of my car.

"Where is it safe?"

Above us, sirens had gone off and helicopter blades were whipping. As I helped her get to a safe area, she told me she was walking her dogs and had planned to stop by a grocery store when she smelled heavy smoke. She went back home, looked out her windows, and watched the fire move quickly through the Hollywood Hills to within a block from her home. She packed what she could: food, clothes, blankets, food for her three small dogs.

"I can't believe this," she said in exhaustion. Makayla Jackson, 26, held her two-year-old son Ramari on the corner of a street as they waited for a ride. They had been evacuated from a homeless shelter that was in danger of burning.

"They just told us to get out and go," she told me.

She said she was heading toward Hollywood High School, where more help was being offered. Many of the roads near the blaze, such as the iconic Hollywood Boulevard, which includes the Hollywood Walk of Fame, are gridlocked with traffic. Some are even driving on the wrong side of the road to escape. The inferno could be seen from nearby freeways, lighting up the dark with bright red hues.
